

The Story of Liao Yang

We have captured Liao Yang, and after nine days' fighting the enemy is retreating. But while we have occupied the town and have forced Kuropatkin to retreat, the great strategical movement which was planned to crush the Russians has failed, says Will H. Brill, correspondent of the Scripps-McRae News association, in Manchuria.

Pursuit would have been practically out of the question under any circumstances, for the soldiers were in no condition to do more work for some time. They had seen nine days' hard fighting and had lived all that time on little else than a few handfuls of cooked rice. They needed rest and food and a stop was imperative.

As it is, the Japanese fought the greatest battle since Sedan and Gravelotte and they won it against overwhelming odds. Their plan for catching Kuropatkin worked out exactly, except for one thing. The three armies came together just at the time and the place planned. It was one of those things that are beyond human control. Incidentally, Kuropatkin exhibited the first cleverness that has emanated from him since the war began. He, of course, was aware of the Japanese plan, and the massing of his men and the entire plan of his battle showed that he thoroughly appreciated what the Japanese were planning for him.

The Rest of Triumph.

The excitement of the great battle has passed and we have settled down to the routine life of a great military station. Our only excitement now-a-days is watching the transport cars and ammunition wagons go by and receiving calls from the correspondents of the first army, to whom we said goodbye five months ago in Tokio.

We are quartered here in the most comfortable house we have occupied since we left Tokio. It is a Russian house situated in the center of the Russian town.

As we sit here on the veranda in the moonlight our main topic of conversation is not the recent great battle. It is on the movements of the army and the probability of another great battle. We speculate and argue on the former occupants of the house. There was a woman here certainly, for her hand can be seen in the planting of the morning glories, in the potted roses, in the flower beds. Even the big plain topped table on which I write is covered with dotted lines made by one of those little wheels such as dressmakers use to mark out their patterns. A little pug dog runs through the rooms of the house and about the veranda, whining and seeking for his mistress, the woman whose home this once was and who was forced to fly before the spectre of war.

There are three or four hundred of these black brick buildings in the Russian town, outside the great walls of the Chinese city of Liao Yang. There are large station buildings and many buildings designed as office buildings for the Russian administrative force. Over on the other side of the railroad track are great shops and roundhouses, nearly all of them destroyed by fire or by shell. Liao Yang was not only a division point, it was the main headquarters of the Manchurian railway, which runs more than 500 miles from Harbin to Port Arthur.

Signs of the Woman.

But it is the homes that one thinks of most. There are scores and scores of them easily distinguished among the hundreds of black brick buildings. They are not less ugly than the other buildings, but about them remains the mark of the women who have occupied them; a vine over a veranda here, a potted plant dead of neglect there, a flower bed, a bit of lace curtain in a window—these and a hundred more signs of the presence of women, the makers of homes.

Here one sees a side of war that is seldom thought of, the personal home side. Women came thousands of miles out into this wilderness, into a strange country among stranger people, and here they made their homes, those homes which mean so much more to women than they do to men. Here they brought their household goods, here they reared their children and prepared to live their lives.

Then came war. Husbands, brothers, sons were called away and the women were left alone. Finally defeat came and retreat. The women were forced to pack their most treasured belongings and start back again over that long line of railroad. Back to civilization, it is true, but away from that place they had learned to call home.

War's Terrible Mark.

All about the town the signs of war are visible. Here and there a shell has torn away a corner of a roof or had blown a great hole in the side of a house. Soldiers are quartered in the pretty little church, a Japanese flag floats over the railway station. Officers occupy the residences; the house where General Kuropatkin lived is now the residence of Field Marshal Oyama. A squadron of Japanese cavalry is camped in the public square, where the Russian band used to play on summer evenings.
